SHORT STORIES FOR EVENING HOURS

SHE KNEW A WAY.

"Strellick doesn't dare say his soul's his own," said the married man. "That's a fact, too. I understand that his wife made him join the church."

"A good thing for him," commented the man's wife.

"I don't deny it," said the married man, "but it's pretty tough not to be able to draw a long breath without asking your wife's permission."

"Are you talking about his inhaling cigarette smoke?" asked the man's wife. "If you are, I think it was just as well that she stopped it. You know that you've been feeling a great deal better since you stopped smoking."

"Pooh!" said the married man. "I don't notice a particle of difference. I wasn't feeling badly, anyway."

"You're looking a great deal better," "Nonsense," said the married man. "I don't really think that an occasional cigar or pipe hurts a man. It's only when it's carried to excess that it's injurious. I'm thinking seriously of beginning again."

"Of course, as you say, you know best how you feel," said his wife. "You know that I wouldn't wish to deprive you of any comfort or dictate to you in any way."

"I should hope you wouldn't," said the married man. "You'd be rather badly fooled if you did. I'm not Strellick."

"I'm very glad you're not, dear," said his wife. "I should be sorry to have my husband afraid to say his soul was his own. It's your soul, my dear, and your own brain and body that you are hurting—and your own heart. You used to tell me that it was my heart, but that was when you was in love with me."

"Who's been telling you that I'm not in love with you now?" asked the man.

His wife smiled sadly. "Well, if you are bound to kill yourself, I haven't the right to say anything," she sighed. "But you are looking better, dear. I assure you. You have a better color and your eyes are brighter and your face fuller than it used to be when you were smoking so much."

"What are you talking about?" exclaimed the married man. "I never smoked so much. I was always a moderate smoker. It wasn't because I was feeling any effect from it that I stopped. I just did it to please you. I would try it for a little while. If you had been like Mrs. Strellick and thrown my cigars into the furnace you would not have got me to stop. I promise you that. Honest, how a man can let a woman boss him the way Strellick does is beyond me."

"I think she ought to be ashamed of herself," said the man's wife. "I call it unwomanly. Still, if I had a husband like Mr. Strellick there's no telling. I'm pretty well satisfied with my own, though."

"That's good," said the man in a gratified tone. "I was only thinking of a cigar, say, after dinner or—"

"You know you wouldn't be satisfied to confine yourself to that," said the man's wife.

"Do you mean to say that I haven't any self control?"

"You know I don't. I know you better than that. If you could keep from smoking at all as long as you have I know you've self control to smoke one a day or keep on without ever smoking. I was telling Mrs. Ritchie the other day that there wasn't any danger of your relapsing; you had too much strength of mind. She was saying that it wouldn't last. She noticed, too, how much better you were looking. She said she believed you grew handsomer all the time. I felt a bit jealous. It was so nice, though, not to have you all smelly of tobacco and to know that you did it to please me, and that your appetite was so much better and your nerves. Still, I am not going to be selfish. If you don't want to please me any longer and would sooner spend your evenings in the basement—"

"Oh, I'm not particular about smoking," said the married man. "It would probably make me stink if I began again anyhow. — Chicago News."
